The sectoral imbalances, those between region and region, have undoubtedly made the movement, from Paris, extend to all of France; on the other hand the Gaullist power and its electoral power has its bases in the countryside: the cases in which the peasants had joined the workers in struggle and supplied economic and social support to the strikers went on multiplying; finally, within the movement one could clearly identify the mass vanguards – which were also able to express themselves on the terrain Mars 1968 (French Edition) the wage – and the most underdeveloped areas. Ross observes:

From this moment forward we can witness the political unification, ever closer
