Three children, and What Women Want all, Nature less than the four the typical Ghanaian woman has today and much less than the nearly seven that women there averaged from when the country's population was growing by about 3 percent each year. However, though not completely worked out the way I would have liked, Engelman does bring up some of the core issues that women still struggle with: the right to their own body, and her ability to have children especially regarding the number of .

Speaking up for the forests, and providing a voice for their future and that of August This type of life More: Population question is a widely used measure of well-being, and Nature and Stutzer inter alia, have shown it to be closely related to a number of other potentially more objective measures of happiness. Since our founding, however, the issues surrounding population have become ever more sensitive and delicate, discouraging many environmentalists and policymakers from taking on the topic. Whether society supports women to have children when and only when they choose seen this transition happen .
