New Paperback Quantity Available: 1. This formulation shows vividly the close connections between psychology and philology. It argues against theories which attempt to map life into phases, suggesting that this is counter-productive and makes people feel like they are failing to live up to what is normal.

Such object-focused drants seem like emotional outtakes, but they are also... For example, it is impossible to talk about projection unless the structure of consciousness is such that self and world are already divided. It must be the light outside, the rising sun. It argues against the parental fallacy whereby our parents are seen as crucial in determining who we are by supplying us with genetic material and behavioral patterns.
